In one of the most unlikely Super Bowl matchups, based off of preseason odds, football fans across the world are treated to a match up between the Seattle Seahawks and the New England Patriots on Feb. 8.

Coming into the season, the Seahawks and the Patriots were not expected to be the last two teams standing, as both Seattle and New England had its win total set at just over eight. While that was the case, it was hard to argue that these two teams were not the best two teams throughout the majority of the 2025-26 NFL season.

For Seattle, the story of its offseason was moving on from quarterback Geno Smith and bringing in Sam Darnold, who Minnesota had let go in favor of the younger J.J. McCarthy. Even though Darnold won 14 games with the Vikings last season, the jury was still out on if he could be among the elite signal callers in the league.

Darnold more than proved that to be true, as he finished the season with 4,048 passing yards and 25 passing touchdowns, while becoming just the second quarterback to win 14 games in back-to-back seasons, the first being Tom Brady.

"We believe in him, this building believes in him, the city believes in him, and you know, it is awesome to run out on the field with him," said Seattle Seahawks wide receiver Jaxon Smith-Njigba.

Smith-Njigba is set to continue his magnificent season in the Super Bowl as the Ohio State alum has staked his name as one of the best playmakers in the game. With his ability to line up all over the field, Smith-Njigba brings versatility and will be a problem for the Patriots' defense all evening.

With Smith-Njigba and Darnold enjoying great seasons, Seattle's biggest strength on offense has been its run game. Led by offensive coordinator Klint Kubiak's run schemes, running back Kenneth Walker will be Seattle's go-to offensive weapon in the game.

The bread and butter of Seattle's team this season though has been the stellar play of its defense. Seattle finished the season giving up just 17.1 points per game, which ranked first in the NFL.

Similar to Darnold, Seattle's defense is loaded with castaway players, including Leonard Williams and DeMarcus Lawrence on the defensive line and Ernest Jones, who acts

Injuries, inconsistent play doomed Packers in 2026

Season ends with Wild Card game loss for second straight year

It is difficult to select one play throughout a team's season to pinpoint why it finished how it did, but for the 2025-26 Packers, one moment in particular paved the way for Green Bay's early playoff exit.

Late in Green Bay's Week 15 matchup with the Denver Broncos, star pass rusher Micah Parsons went down with a non-contact knee injury while chasing Broncos quarterback Bo Nix. Parsons' knee injury resulted in a torn ACL, ending his season and beginning a long offseason of recovery.

While Green Bay was in a position to make the playoffs, which it ultimately did, losing one of the best players in the league proved to be a nail in the coffin, as the Packers lost each of the final four games of the season.

Before Parsons was injured though, the Packers looked like one of the top contenders to win the Super Bowl.

After a disappointing end to the 2024-25 season, Green Bay retooled, trading for Parsons and giving quarterback Jordan Love another offseason of much-needed development. This quickly gave Packer fans hope as Green Bay came out of the gates hot and destroyed the Detroit Lions in a highly anticipated matchup, with Parsons recording a sack in his debut.

The Packers rolled through its next game against Washington in a similar manner, by utilizing a heavy pass rush and making its opponent make the mistakes.

After starting 2-0, Green Bay went to Cleveland, where it faced Joe Flacco for the first time this season. In a defensive slog, a Brandon McManus missed kick proved to be the difference, as the Browns pulled off the upset and handed the Packers its first loss of the season.

Looking to bounce back, the Packers traveled to Dallas in a Sunday Night Football that was expected to be a major matchup, as Parsons returned to the team that just traded him. Parsons continued to shine in this game, as he recorded two quarterback hits and one sack, but the game ended in a 40-40 tie.

In an incredible offensive performance, both Love and Cowboys quarterback Dak Prescott finished the game with 300-plus passing yards and three passing touchdowns.

After the tie to Dallas, Green Bay got hot. It avenged its loss to Flacco, by beating him in the second matchup after he was traded in-season to the Cincinnati Bengals after Joe Burrow went down with an injury.

Shortly after the Bengals win, Green Bay took down Arizona before traveling to Pittsburgh in one of the most anticipated matchups in recent memory, as this was the first time Aaron Rodgers was playing against Green Bay. Green Bay's offense was too much for Rodgers and Pittsburgh to overcome as Love outdueled his former mentor, throwing for 360 yards and three touchdown passes.

Tight end Tucker Kraft also staked a claim as best tight end in the league during this game, as he finished with 143 yards and two touchdowns on seven receptions.

"I told (Rodgers) that I have a lot of love for him, so it was very fun to go against him," said Love, on his interaction with Rodgers after the game.

Green Bay's three-game win streak came to a screeching halt during its Week 9 matchup with the Carolina Panthers. While Carolina would eventually win the NFC South and make the playoffs, losing to the Panthers in a cold November game felt like a bad loss.

In a 16-13 loss, Green Bay's (to this point) stellar defense was run all over, as Panthers running back Rico Dowdle picked up 130 yards and two touchdowns. Stalling in the red zone, two turnovers and a missed field goal proved to be too much for the Packers to overcome as well.

Even though the loss stung, Kraft went down with a knee injury in the game, ending his season as he was later diagnosed with a torn ACL.

Looking to rebound on a Monday night against the Philadelphia Eagles, Green Bay once again lost in a boring defensive matchup. After no points were scored through the first two quarters of the game, Philadelphia jumped out to a 10-point advantage after a DeVonta Smith touchdown in the fourth quarter. Green Bay was unable to make up the double-digit deficit, as it scored just seven total points.

Sitting at 5-3-1, while nowhere near out of playoff contention, it felt like the season was getting away from Green Bay. The Packers looked themselves in the mirror and ripped off four straight victories over the New York Giants and each of the three divisional opponents.

These games were highlighted by Love throwing for a career high four touchdown passes against the Lions and Keisean Nixon coming away with a game-ending interception of Bears quarterback Caleb Williams in the first of three matchups between the teams.

The four straight wins pushed Green Bay's record to 9-3-1, giving the team the lead in the division and setting its eyes on coming away with the NFC's top seed in the playoffs.

That's when the season took a turn though. Green Bay's next matchup came at Denver. With no playoff scenarios at stake in this game, a win would have been great for the Packers, but getting back home without any major injuries was the number one priority. Parsons was eventually lost for the season and (while it wasn't fully true at the time), so were the Packers' chances at contending for a Super Bowl.

After losing Parsons and losing to the Broncos, the Packers suffered three more losses to end the regular season.

The first came against the Bears, after Green Bay collapsed in the fourth quarter. Chicago scored 13 points in the fourth and after recovering an onside kick pushed the game to overtime in a game started by back up quarterback Malik Willis. Green Bay's possession in overtime stalled, and Chicago finished its comeback by Williams connecting with DJ.J. Moore for a walkoff touchdown.

Looking to bounce back, Green Bay dropped its last home game of the season to the Baltimore Ravens, after Ravens running back Derrick Henry recorded the best game of his hall-of-fame career, finishing with 216 rushing yards and four rushing touchdowns on 36 carries.

Finally to end the season, even with losses in each of the last three games, Green Bay had locked up the NFC's seventh seed, it took on the Minnesota Vikings. Love and Willis both sat out the game, as Clayton Tune was given the start at quarterback. Green Bay's offense struggled, as it was only able to pick up 121 total yards and three points, losing 16-3 and ending the season on a four-game losing streak.

Even with the injuries to Parsons and Kraft and the regular season ending as it did, vibes were high as Green Bay and Chicago matched up for the third time.

The Packers went into the game favored, which may seem odd, but given that the Packers outplayed Chicago for seven out of the eight previous quarters it made sense. Even with the disappointing end to

Jordan Love led the team to two victories over the defending NFC North Champion Detroit Lions. His performance in Detroit earned him the Madden Thanksgiving Day MVP following a 31-24 win. GREG MELLIS | GREEN & GOLD EXPRESS

Above, Tucker Kraft emerged as an elite playmaker, recording 32 receptions for 489 yards and 6 touchdowns in just 8 games. the regular season, Love said that this matchup against the team's biggest rival are the moments that players get up for.

"Its definitely a rivalry game," said Love, before the Wild Card matchup. "Since I have gotten here with the Packers, it is something you understand what it is playing in this game. I think it has amped up over the years and with us splitting, going 1-1 on the season, it is going to be at an all-time high this week."

Green Bay came out of the gates hot, going up

21-3 at halftime. Things all changed when the fourth quarter came around though. Green Bay once again collapsed, leading to a 25-point quarter for the Bears giving Chicago the 31-27 victory, ending the Packers season.

When looking at the season as a whole, there were some good and some bad, but injuries to Kraft, Parsons, Elgton Jenkins, Devonte Wyatt and Zach Tom, on top of inconsistent play for McManus, Nixon and Josh Jacobs proved to be too much for Green Bay to overcome, ultimately ending the season in the Wild Card Round of the playoffs for the second straight season.

Schneider, Wolf help guide their teams to Super Bowl LX

GREG MELLIS | GREEN & GOLD EXPRESS

The last time the two teams met, it was an instant classic with Malcolm Butler picking off Russell Wilson at the goal line in the final minute to preserve a 28-24 victory for the Patriots.

This time around, the two teams are drastically different, but they do share a common characteristic in the front office.

Eliot Wolf is the Patriots' de facto general manager, who helps run the football department in New England even if he does not have an official title.

In Seattle, it's John Schneider who runs Seattle's football operation; he has Seattle in their third Super Bowl since he took over.

Of course, both Schneider and Wolf were in Green Bay to start their careers under the general manager stewardship of Eliot's father, Ron Wolf.

Eliot Wolf is also flanked by Alonzo Highsmith, who was in Green Bay under Wolf and Ted Thompson as well.

The trend of poaching talent out of Green Bay or the Ron Wolf tree continued this offseason with Jon-Eric Sullivan accepting the job in Miami to become the Dolphins' general manager.

Christian Watson returned from a ACL injury, finishing with 35 receptions for 611 yards and six touchdowns in 10 games. Watson celebrates a TD abasing the Ravens.

Shortly after Sullivan was hired, he brought Packers' defensive coordinator Jeff Hafley with him to be their head coach.

Hafley had a successful two-year stint as the defensive coordinator in Green Bay. The defense finished strong in his first season and was off to a great start in 2025 until Micah Parsons went down for the season with a torn ACL.

Hafley's defense finished with a thud, which culminated with a 25-point collapse in the fourth quarter of what turned out to be Hafley's final game in Green Bay.

While there is some frustration to be had about the Packers only having three Super Bowl appearances and two titles since 1992 with three consecutive franchise quarterbacks, it's a level of success that really isn't able to be measured across the league.

The Packers represent a lot of things in the NFL, and one of those is stability. The Packers have almost always been good since 1992. Under Brett Favre, they had just one losing season, going 4-12 in 2005.

They've never had a losing season under Jordan Love and had just two under Aaron Rodgers when he did not miss significant time with an injury.

Three losing seasons in more than 30 years is enviable to anyone across the league.

Furthermore, Ron Wolf is in the Hall of Fame, and he's seen his disciples grow up to be successful general managers in their own way once they were able to sit in the big chair.

Thompson was a pupil of Wolf's in Green Bay and took two separate teams to the Super Bowl — losing Super Bowl XL with Seattle to Pittsburgh and winning Super Bowl XLV against Pittsburgh when he came to Green Bay.

Thompson was elected to the Packers Hall of Fame for the excellence in Green Bay during his tenure.

When Thompson moved on, he gave way to Brian Gutekunst, who has overseen the turnover from Rodgers to Love. He has not won a championship yet, but he helped streamline a rebuild in Green Bay, moving away from Rodgers and handing the keys to Love.

The most successful pupil of Wolf has been Schneider. Schneider is about to see his team participate in its third Super Bowl since he took over. They've won one of the two Super Bowls they've played in and will be favored to win this one as well.

Wolf helped oversee a rebuild in New England, which was reeling from Tom Brady's departure in free agency, but Wolf helped find his eventual long-term successor in Drake Maye.

Wolf does not yield the same power that Schneider does and is more of a partner with Mike Vrabel but still has been part of the organization's rise back to a national power.

Wolf and Schneider are two examples. Another is John Dorsey, who helped build Kansas City's core that fell one win short of three consecutive Super Bowl titles. He had some success in Cleveland, as well.

With a track record like what we've listed above, it makes sense why struggling teams, like the Dolphins, would want to follow the blueprint of stability that has been the Green Bay Packers during the last 30 years.

as Seattle's quarterback on defense, at the inside linebacker position. The presence of those three in the front seven have given Seattle's young secondary ample opportunity to shine.

While Seattle's defense has been arguably the best in the league this season, New England's is not far behind. The Patriots have given up just 17.3 points per game, which ranks second behind Seattle.

What has been interesting about New England's defense is that it does not feature many household names. Milton Williams, who slots in at the defensive tackle position, was a major pickup this offseason, after he spent the first four seasons of his career in Philadelphia, winning a Super Bowl.

Defensive back Christian Gonzalez joins Williams as the superstars on this defense, as the 23-year old has quickly established himself as one of the best at his position in the game.

If there is a household name for this defense in the organization, it has to be head coach Mike Vrabel.

Patriots and football fans alike will remember Vrabel from being a fixture on the early 2000's New England Patriots Super Bowl teams. Racking up sacks and catching touchdowns on offense as a tight end, Vrabel quickly established himself as a fan favorite in New England.

After retiring, Vrabel moved to coaching, where he took various jobs, before becoming the Patriots head coach at the beginning of the season. Using his experience and knowledge as a Super Bowl-winning defensive mind, Vrabel quickly established the Patriots as one of the better defensive units in the league.

In reality, New England and Seattle are built similarly. Vrabel and Seahawks head coach Mike Macdonald are defensive minds, both teams feature strong rushing attacks, and both teams are not afraid to win ugly.

The key to winning the game for both teams is going to come down to the play of the quarterbacks. After winning 28 games in the last two seasons, Darnold looks ready to play, while Patriots quarterback Drake Maye is still somewhat of a mystery.

The 23-year old has performed as one of the better quarterbacks in the NFL this season, as he finished the regular season with a real shot of winning the most valuable player award. As he is set to become the second youngest quarterback to start a Super Bowl, behind Dan Marino, keeping his composure is going to be key for the Patriots' offense to move the ball.

Luckily for Maye, he is at his best when under pressure, as his running ability has allowed him to limit turnovers when the pocket breaks down or receivers don't get open. With so much of his career ahead of him, Maye is ready for the biggest game of his career.

"We have a chance to go win the Super Bowl and that's what it is. That's pretty cool," said Maye.

With so much attention surrounding the quarterback play and the defensive dominance, one under-the-radar player to watch in this game is Seahawks' wide receiver and kick returner Rashid Shaheed.

Seattle acquired Shaheed from the New Orleans Saints this season, and he has been a force for Seattle. Shaheed has the ability to provide quick points and great field position, as he has recorded four touchdown returns in his four-year career, including returning the first kick for a touchdown in Seattle's Divisional matchup against the 49ers.

Who will stay, and who will go?

BY LUKE REIMER
Green & Gold Express

With Green Bay's season ending prematurely, the team is taking some time off before moving to the new season.

When the new season opens, the first thing that needs to be looked at for the Packers is how it is going to handle a few unrestricted free agents on the 2026 roster. The Packers will enter the new season over the cap by about $3 million, meaning that money is going to have to be moved around. Whether it be cutting or restructuring contracts, the 2026-27 Packers team is undoubtedly going to look different than this season's team.

It makes sense to start with the unrestricted free agents. Being an unrestricted free agent means that a player's contract with their current team has expired, and they have met the minimum league experience requirements to sign with any team in the NFL without any restrictions.

Let's start on the offensive line.

Rasheed Walker came to Green Bay as a seventh-round selection in 2022 and has started 48 games protecting quarterback Jordan Love's blindside. Walker has had an up-and-down career so far, as he has proved much better in

Nate Hobbs and Rashan Gary failed to live up to high expectations and significant financial investments. GREG MELLIS | GREEN & GOLD EXPRESS tackle being a very difficult position to fill in today's NFL, Walker is going to be attractive in free agency, meaning that Green Bay should expect to lose him this offseason.

The other big name for Green Bay on the offensive line is Sean Rhyan. After drafting Rhyan in the third round of the 2022 NFL draft, this past season was the first real season where Rhyan was able to showcase his play.

Part of the reason why Rhyan was drafted was for his versatility to play nearly anywhere on the offensive line, something that we saw this season. In 2025, Rhyan logged snaps at center and both guard spots, with his best play coming at the center position after Elgton Jenkins went down with the injury.

With injuries plaguing Jenkins over the last year, bringing Rhyan back should be in the cards for Green Bay as he has proven to be a solid run blocker, while providing starting quality snaps at center and being a great depth piece at each guard spot.

"It has kind of been the theme of my career," said Rhyan, after being asked if he has the ability to move around the offensive line and proving doubters wrong early in his career. "You have to bend, not break. So I stayed ready, so it has been OK so far."

Green Bay has a major decision to make at the wide receiver position with Romeo Doubs.

Throughout his career, Doubs has proved to be as solid as they come, recording 2,424 yards and 21 touchdowns through four seasons. Given the injury history of Christian Watson and the inconsistent play of other Packers receivers, Doubs has probably been asked to play at a higher level than he is capable of, but with all of the inconsistency, Doubs has proved to be the go-to guy on passing downs for Love.

Unfortunately, Doubs' time in Green Bay might be numbered as Watson signed a $13.25 million extension in September, and the Packers selected Matthew Golden and Savion Williams in the most recent draft. Doubs should be an attractive name in free agency, where he can either sign to a rebuilding team as the wide receiver one or to a contender as a wide receiver three.

The other big name on offense is Malik Willis, who has certainly revitalized his career as a backup quarterback. In replacement of Love this season, Willis proved that he is capable of being a starting quarterback in this league, highlighted by his 300-plus yard, three-touchdown performance against Baltimore.

Packers pushing up against cap space for 2026

Team has cash options with personnel moves, free agents

BY JACOB WESTENDORF
Green & Gold Express

The Super Bowl is upon us, and for the 15th consecutive season, the Green Bay Packers are not playing in it.

The Packers made the postseason with a 9-7-1 record and bowed out in the first round of the post-season with a collapse in the fourth quarter against their most hated rival, the Chicago Bears.

Now, the attention in Green Bay turns to the off-season and how they'll be able to improve the team and bring back some of the players set to be free agents.

The NFL has had a salary cap since free agency began in 1993, with one major exception. The NFL was uncapped before the collective bargaining agreement expired during the 2010 season.

Ironically enough, that's the year that the Green Bay Packers, the NFL's smallest market, won the Super Bowl.

The Packers used their cap space a season ago to acquire Micah Parsons, and it was the most impactful move they've made since signing Reggie White all the way back in 1993.

The salary cap can be manipulated with different levers, triggers and separate rules to restructure contracts. That just simply moves money into the future.

We've seen the Packers operate that way in the twilight years of Aaron Rodgers. For example, David Bakhtiari was no longer on the team in 2024, but due to some of the restructuring and moving of money within his contract, he was still counting against Green Bay's salary cap.

Kenny Clark was an example of that during the 2025 season as well. Sometimes, it's a price worth paying to keep players in the present. Other times, it can end in disaster.

Saving cap space is the name of the game when resources are not unlimited like they are for some teams in Major League Baseball.

One way to do that is to pay a player with signing bonuses up front to spread the money across several years to save money against the cap.

According to X, Packers salary cap guru Ken Ingalls said one of the best examples of this practice is quarterback Jordan Love.

Love received a $75 million signing bonus when he signed his new contract in 2024; it was spread across the cap over five years and paid in $15 million installments.

The bet the Packers are making is that Love will be their quarterback for the next five years, which after the way he played this season, he absolutely should be.

If, for whatever reason, the Packers decided to move on, there would be ramifications in the form of dead cap. That happens when a player's money counts against the salary cap without him being on the team.

A present example would be like what we just talked about with Love. Love has been paid $30 million of that signing bonus due to the two installments of the $75 million signing bonus, there would be a $49.9 million dead cap charge for the remainder of the guaranteed money on Love's contract, in addition to the additional $45 million they would owe him.

Most examples are not that extreme, but the possibility of dead cap is one of the risks that teams take when they hand out market-setting contracts and push money into the future.

Think of it like consistently paying the minimum on your credit card statement.

In terms of what is available to the Packers for this offseason, that is to be determined. There are some moves that they will have to make to get under the salary cap just to operate in 2026.

One of the easiest moves for them will likely be releasing offensive lineman Elgton Jenkins.

Jenkins did not look like the same player last year, and releasing him will create about $19 million in salary cap space.

Other potential cut candidates to save cap space include defensive end Rashan Gary, running back Josh Jacobs, cornerback Keisean Nixon and kicker Brandon McManus.

The Packers will be

Jordan Love had a strong year, leading the team to the playoffs with a solid statistical performance, including 23 touchdowns, six interceptions, more than 3,300 passing yards and a high passer rating.

GREG MELLIS | GREEN & GOLD EXPRESS

able to use some money in free agency, but how much they'll have to spend will depend on what they do with some of the aforementioned players. They'll also likely be restructuring some contracts and pushing money into the future.

That's the price of having a market-setting quarterback and a star defensive player like Parsons.

Of all their players who are set to be free agents, the most likely to be re-signed appeared to be Quay Walker, but he noted midseason they had not talked about his contract in quite some time.

Don't be surprised if any of Green Bay's pending unrestricted free agents like Walker, Romeo Doubs and Rasheed Walker all end up playing elsewhere in 2026.

On Aug. 28, 2025, the Green Bay Packers acquired All-Pro edge rusher Micah Parsons from the Dallas Cowboys in a monumental trade, making him the highest-paid non-quarterback in NFL history at the time.

Will draft give Packers the pieces they need to win?

BY LUKE REIMER
Green & Gold Express

After two straight seasons losing in the Wild Card Round of the playoffs, there may be some more changes within the depth chart of the Green Bay Packers.

Packers general manager Brian Gutekunst has made a number of splashes in recent years, bringing in Josh Jacobs, Xavier McKinney and Micah Parsons. Add into the fact that Jordan Love and Christian Watson were recently extended, and it has become clear that the nucleus of Green Bay is set.

With a large sum of money tied up in that nucleus, it is likely that Green Bay is not going to be very active when it comes to signing the big name free agents who are going to warrant bigger contracts. That doesn't mean that Green Bay is going to sit on its hands, though.

It is going to be difficult for Green Bay to bring back all of its unrestricted free agents, so to refill the team, Gutekunst and his staff are going to have to penny pinch and find those diamonds in the rough.

"Any opportunity you have to help your football team, you have to look at it and discuss it as a group," said Gutekunst.

Historically, Gutekunst has opted to fill out the roster throughout the draft. This season though, Green Bay will be without a first round pick, as it was traded to Dallas for Parsons. Gutekunst may be active to pick up additional picks in Despite being the Packers' most reliable receiver in 2025, Romeo Doubs (87) is likely to test a "pass-happy" market where his value could exceed Green Bay's budget. After a stellar 2025 season where he posted a 134.6 passer rating in relief appearances, Malik Willis (2) is expected to pursue a starting role.

the draft, but as it stands, Green Bay's first selection will be pick 52.

Given that Green Bay is probably going to need to fill its offensive line, if it can't re-sign Rasheed Walker, Sean Rhyan or both, that pick seems likely to be a piece there. Northwestern's Caleb Tiernan looks like a piece that Green Bay can slot in at the tackle position.

If Green Bay elects to go to the defensive side of the ball, Indiana defensive back D'angelo Ponds or Texas Tech defensive lineman Lee Hunter are certainly in the cards to be selected.

With the Packers lack of premium draft capital, finding a piece or two in free agency has to be at the top of Gutekunst's priority list.

Defensive back Martin Emerson, who has spent his first four years in Cleveland, looks like he can be a relatively cheap player who has the tools to start immediately on immediately produce.

One other interesting spot that Green Bay will likely need to fill this offseason is the backup quarterback position.

Malik Willis is likely to be a starting quarterback for a different team next season, leaving a void on the Packers depth chart. Green Bay has historically looked toward the late rounds of the draft to bring on a quarterback.

If that trend continues this season, players like Illinois' Luke Altmyer or Kansas' Jalon Daniels could be the solution. If the team were to look toward veterans, players like Gardner Minshew, who backed up Patrick Mahomes in Kansas City, or Trey Lance, who backed up Justin Herbert with the Los Angeles Chargers, could conceivably be wearing green and gold next season.
